USING ERIC AS A CURRICULUM RESOURCE

Educators who have questions about curriculum development, improvement, and revision should become acquainted with the extensive information which can be found in the Educational Resources Information Center (ERIC) system. Use of the materials in this library, available throughout the United States, will facilitate the work of the professional who wishes to accomplish educational improvement and change. The ERIC system can be consulted for many materials other than those related to curriculum, however documents related to curriculum make up one of its major components.

The ERIC system is a national information system which provides access to the literature of education which often remained unpublished and inaccessible prior to the development of the system. The system was originated by the U.S. Office of Education in the late 1960's to serve as a storage for the increasing amount of materials being printed as a result of the acceleration of efforts to improve learning by the federal government. The system is now supported and operated by the National Institute of Education.

There are approximately 20,000 documents available from the ERIC system which are directly related to curriculum design, development, evaluation, planning, and research. Another 6,000 to 7,000 curriculum guides are stored in the system. Related subjects such as instructional programs, lesson plans, course descriptions, learning modules, and teaching guides may also be found in ERIC. Every major discipline is also represented in the system.

Sixteen clearinghouses are included in the ERIC system. Each clearinghouse specializes in a different multidiscipline, educational area. Each searches out and screens pertinent documents in its field. Each document entered into the data base is analysed according to ERIC selection criteria, abstracted and indexed. Through the clearinghouses and collection sites educators can access current information on any topic. As an archive for educational information ERIC also insures that documents will be permanently stored and safeguarded from loss to the profession.

Once documents have been designated by the clearinghouses for inclusion in the system, they are sent to commercial facilities where they are microfilmed, reproduced and disseminated. Monthly journals are also collated and published which notify educators of the most recent documents accessed by the system. Many libraries and school systems subscribe to the monthly journal Resources in Education which is published by the Superintendent of Documents and serves as the official notification of the information which has been included in the system. A list of all clearinghouses, their addresses, and functions is included in the appendix.

In New Jersey educators may find Resources in Education at most public libraries, many school libraries, and school district offices. The headquarters buildings of county libraries often subscribe to the journal. Complete collections of the ERIC documents on microfiche may be found at Trenton State College, Rutgers, Princeton and other colleges as well as through the four Educational Improvement Centers. The New Jersey Occupational Research and Development Center in Edison, New Jersey will provide free copies of ERIC documents on microfiche for anyone who lives or works in the state of New Jersey. A list of all New Jersey and eastern Pennsylvania ERIC document collection sites is included in the appendix.

In order to use the ERIC system one should obtain a copy of the Thesaurus of ERIC Descriptors. The thesaurus is a controlled vocabulary of educational terms called descriptors (similar to subject headings in a library's card catalog). Descriptors are used to index and enter documents into the ERIC system and to assist users in searching the system. Recently the ERIC system has conducted a Vocabulary Improvement Project in order to update and redefine the descriptors or terms used in the system. Since ERIC can be searched by computer, it is important to recognize that the descriptors are limited in number and their definitions standardized. Thus, the first time user may find that their use of a term may be different from ERIC's and will have to search the thesaurus for alternate descriptors which are most closely related to the user's meaning. Once the system has been used several times the language of ERIC will become familiar to the user.

Once the user has decided which descriptors best describe the educational problem, curriculum or other material sought, one should obtain a copy of Resources in Education, the monthly journal referred to before. It is often easiest to conduct the first search by turning to the subject index located near the back of the journal. Author, institution, and publication type indices are also found here and may be used for more extensive searches.

All ERIC descriptors which have been used to index documents for that particular month are listed alphabetically in the subject index. Under each descriptor are found the titles of all documents indexed for the month. The user will also find an ED number located under the document title. This number is similar to an accession number and will always refer only to the one document for which it has been assigned. The user should note the numbers of document titles in which one is interested (usually it is best to list on scrap paper).

Once the user has selected several documents to review, one should turn to the front of the monthly journal to the document resume section. Documents are grouped by clearinghouse in the resume section and the educator may find other documents of interest by browsing through the resume sections - this however will not result in a systematic search.

The user should then locate the specific document by ED number. The resume will note the author, title, publication date, number of pages and other information pertinent to the document. Directly above the abstract of the document will be found a list of all descriptors used to index (describe) the document. Often one can use these other descriptors to further extend one's search. The abstract gives a complete outline of the document and should provide the user with enough information to decide whether or not he wishes to view the actual document.

At this point the New Jersey educator has a decided advantage over many others. One may not only go to an ERIC document collection site, but also send for free microfiche copies from the New Jersey Occupational Research and Development Center. Simply list in numerical order up to twenty ED numbers of ERIC documents and send the list of requests to:

The New Jersey Occupational Research and Development
Resource Center
Building 871, R.M.C.
Plainfield Avenue
Edison, N.J. 08817

You should allow approximately two weeks for your request to be processed. Up to five documents may also be requested by telephone. The Center's number is (201) 985-7769 or (201) 985-7929.

Since January 1979 the first document listed in Resources in Education is that month's computer printout of the journal. By combining the free service from the New Jersey Occupational Research and Development Resource Center with this new service of ERIC, it is possible to obtain free copies of Resources in Education. Thus the whole ERIC system becomes a free information resource for New Jersey educators.

In order to read microfiche a special reader (machine) is needed. Most public libraries have microfiche readers but there are several portable readers available for free loan from county school superintendents and other locations throughout New Jersey. The New Jersey Occupational Research and Development Resource Center can inform you of the nearest free loan reader.

ERIC has become a complete resource and information system for the educator. Soon over 500,000 documents will be included in the system. Those who wish to bring about change in education can no longer overlook the wealth and depth of information it can provide.

Included in the appendix are sample pages of the subject index and document resumes from Resources in Education, May, 1980.
